After a quarrel with the captain they mbark on Volta's yacht, the Sunflower, urly, a plaiusman and old friend of cott, going with them.

At sea they pick up Sir Henry Lascelles inging to a sinking sailboat.

Apparently he has deliberately thrown inself in the yacht's way.

Some days later they learn by wireless and Count Trumanoff is on the steamer rossjack with Marian. Wireless appears or help come from the Crossjack stating hat the vessel has been held up by a irate and compelled to surrender Marian of her brother. Rounding a point of ind the yacht comes upon a torpedo cat, and on the deck are Marian, Fred, rumanoff, and Baron Hofstein. Marian alls on Scott to save her.

A fight ensues and the torpedo boat is uns. The Sunflower is wrecked, and he following day Scott and Curly find fragelves on strange shores.

Inore matches? The lantern's burned out, I guess."

I touched a match to the wick of the lantern, and it blazed up, illumining the scene and showing the faces of Marian and the bishop, white against the background of blackness. The hishop still slept, and Marian had evidently just awakened, for her eyes were still dewy from sleep and her wavy hair clustered in disordered perfection about her shoulders.

"Good morning," she exclaimed—"that is, if it is really morning. Oh! I feel so rested. Shall I wake unele?"

"You might as well. We must be moving soon, you know."

The bishop waked slowly, but saney, his first words showing that he was himself again. In fact, Curly's largers of the water holes are und which the ancient civilization for until an exclamation from Curly recalled ma to myself.

CHAPTER XX.

The Work of the Image.

I ONG afterward—I never knew how long—I struggled back to consciousness. In imagination I was back at West Point, and my roommate was rousing me for reveille as he had often done, for I was always hard to arouse. I yawned, stretching out my arms with a thrust that sent some one staggering backward, and opened my eyes on utterblackness, out of which came the complaining voice of Curly uplifted in wild objurations.

For a moment I did not know where I was; then memory returned with a rush, and I apologized to the unseen voice, which quickly dropped to lower tones.

Being' shut up in this hole! My eyes count up in this hole! My eyes pending the passard. Hy amartin' like the very dickeis. How your eady? Then come on."

In another moment we were ascending the passage, seeking the unknown. I led the way with a large package of tinned goods strapped to my back; next came the bishop with Marian close tenhind him; and Curly brought up the rear with a package nearly as big as my own.

I did not know how long that passage was. I suppose we could not really have been more than five minutes in traversing it, though the time seemed much longer. But it ended at last, abruptly, against a closed door. I examined its fasteaings, which were filmsy to the last degree, and then put my shoulder against it and simply pushed it down. Immediately beyond, through a screen of bushes, we saw the yellow light of midday.

As Curly stepped over the broken door he gave it a contemptuous kick. "Aln't that just like a grease?" he

I raised my eyes to Curly, and an ex-amation broke from his lips. His sun-nned face was flushed and swellen d his eyelids puffed. With a quick alization of what this meant. I spun und to Marfan

"What is the result? The side on which I put the naked rock is very very sore, while the other side is unhurt. The emanation, wherever it is, couldn't pass the tin. That isn't proof of my radium theory, of course, but it's corroboration. And if it's radium, we ought to be better by tomorrow."

The sound of running feet came from the parsage into which Curly had plunged a moment before, and the frontiersma appeared, his aspect even wilder un it had been before.

"I've ixed that blamed Image," he cried 'rlumphantiy. "He won't hurt no more people if there's any virtue in gunpowder."

I grabbed him by the arm.

"What have you done?" I demanded anxiously.

"Done? I've laid a train to these gunpowder."

I grabbed him by the arm.

"What have you done?" I demanded anxiously.

"Done? I've laid a train to those powder kegs and I've touched it off anxiously.

A muffled explosion came to our ears. Far below, on the other side of the funnel rose a cloud of white smoke mixed with darker masses of rock and debris marking the spot beneath which the powder had been hidden. A moment more and the rim of the funnel seemed to collapse. The century-old trees on the slope tottered and broke like saplings; the crash of sliding rock screamed in our ears; the ground quivered beneath our feet.

The sides of the tunnel, undermined by the water below and ready to fall, were pouring into the chasm in a great landslide. Starting on the far side, it was eating its way toward us with ever-growing swiftness.

There was small time for thought. Turing, I snatched Marian up in my arms. "Run! Run!" I screamed to the others, as I leaped up the pathway that led over the rim of the crater and raced away across the level.

As I ran, I felt the solid rock dropping away beneath my feet. Trees creaked and fell across my path; a dozen times I thought that I was being dragged down to death. On I ran until I could run no longer, then dropped my pracious burden beside a great shoulder of rock and fell breathiess beside her. Another second, and the tishon, aided by Curly, reached my side and dropped there, casping.

For a moment I did not know whether or not we were safe; whether we were to live or die. Then the rumbling died away and silence slowly resumed its sway.
